Dear Professor Donovan:

Please convey to the Recognition Conference of the Business Marketing Representatives of AT & T this Administration's appreciation for the outstanding contributions that American technological industries have made to the American economy, welfare and society.

President Reagan's belief that free industry is the best industry, the belief he staunchly defended before the other leaders at Versailles, is more than justified by the achievements of the Americans in the field of high technology.

The imagination and vitality of the people within this new and exciting industry of telecommunications and computers will continue to make America strong, and the wide-ranging application of this industry holds the promise of the betterment of mankind.

I salute you all for the technological achievements made so far, and for your present and future contributions to America.

Sincerely,

George Bush
